Review of CapsLock Indicator: CapsLock Indicator was a decent open-source application that displayed key status. I found the display of key status easy to configure, and the available options were good. It could have been better, though, as there were a number of glitches and shortcomings. This is a quick and dirty EXE file that has a bunch of shortcut files for easy distribution with. It allows you to create as many shortcut files as you like. It's roughly a copy of WinRuns' "Hotkey Assist" with the same options and workings for the taskbar (change foreground, background, and corner for your user). Uninstallation is the same as "regular" EXE files. Do you use Desktop Grid? This widget adds the ability to show you a grid of icons for all open and pinned windows. It works in a similar way to the Tray Toolbar, but allows you to view all active windows and pinned apps, and it can show window previews as well as icons and icons with titles. The main difference is that you can pin (make "stick b7e8fdf5c8

This is bad news for several reasons. First, mountain snow pack accounts for about three-quarters of the state's total water resources, as reported on June 20 by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. That means that if the state loses even a small percentage of its snow pack, the result will be a correspondingly large reduction in the size of the reservoirs and the subsequent amount of water available for use. Second, areas with less snow, including the San Joaquin Valley, are expected to experience even greater reductions in groundwater supplies. There is certainly no shortage of headlines and stories about the impact of California's drought on the state's agriculture and food supply, but what many California residents don't realize is that groundwater — the water that underlies much of the state — is increasingly being used as a source of drinking water. While California's snow pack is certainly declining, there is actually a decline in
